

BRIEFING PAPER

Number 06553, 22 May 2018

Zero-hours contracts

By Doug Pyper
Andrew Powell

Inside:

1. Introduction
2. Zero-hours contracts statistics
3. The legal implications of zero-hours contracts
4. Zero-hours contracts and jobseeker benefits
5. Coalition Government review of zero-hours contracts
6. Coalition Government consultations
7. Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015
8. Labour Party proposals
9. Taylor Review
10. Scottish Affairs Committee report
11. Comment

Contents

Summary	3
1. Introduction	4
2. Zero-hours contracts statistics	5
2.1 Prevalence of zero-hour contracts	5
Number of people on zero-hour contracts	5
Number of zero-hour contracts	5
Has there been a rise in the use of zero-hour contracts?	6
Why is the LFS estimate different from the business survey estimate?	6
2.2 Working hours for those on zero-hour contracts	7
2.3 Characteristics of people employed on zero-hours contracts	7
2.4 Prevalence by industry and business size	8
As a share of industry workforce	8
Business size	9
2.5 Pay	9
2.6 Changes in how the ONS will collect data on zero-hour contracts	10
3. The legal implications of zero-hours contracts	11
3.1 Zero-hours contracts and employment status	11
The reality of the agreement	12
Continuity of service	13
4. Zero-hours contracts and jobseeker benefits	14
5. Coalition Government review of zero-hours contracts	16
6. Coalition Government consultations	18
6.1 Consultation outcome: banning exclusivity clauses	18
6.2 Consultation on banning exclusivity clauses	19
7. Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015	20
7.1 Exclusivity Terms Regulations	20
8. Labour Party proposals	22
8.1 Labour Party proposals prior to the 2015 General Election	22
The Pickavance Report	23
Labour Party Manifesto 2015	24
8.2 Private Members' Bill	24
9. Taylor Review	25
9.1 Government response	26
10. Scottish Affairs Committee report	27
11. Comment	28

Summary

This note discusses zero-hours contracts: a type of contract used by employers whereby workers have no guaranteed hours and agree to be potentially available for work. They are used increasingly by companies seeking labour flexibility and by workers seeking flexibility around their other commitments.

Opinion on zero-hours contracts has been mixed. Employee organisations tend to argue that the contracts result in financial insecurity for workers who lack key employment rights; employer organisations stress their utility when seeking to meet fluctuating demand and argue that they play a vital role in keeping people in employment.

Prior to the 2015 General Election, the Coalition Government and the Opposition proposed measures to address concerns about the use of zero-hours contracts. Notably, section 153 of the Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015 and supporting regulations seek to prevent the use of “exclusivity clauses” in zero-hours contracts (i.e. prohibit a contractual requirement for a worker to work exclusively for one employer irrespective of the hours offered).

1. Introduction

The expression "zero-hours contract" is a colloquial term for a contract of service under which the worker is not guaranteed work and is paid only for work carried out. It generally leads to "a form of working where the worker is not guaranteed any work but has to be available as and when the employer needs them".¹ The Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service has discussed zero-hours contracts in the following terms:

Increasingly, many companies in the retail and hospitality industries are taking on staff on 'zero-hours' contracts - that is, where people agree to be available for work as and when required, but have no guaranteed hours or times of work. Zero-hours contracts effectively provide employers with a pool of people who are 'on-call' and can be used when the need arises.

Generally, as an employer, you are not obliged to offer work to workers on zero-hours contracts - but nor are they obliged to accept any work you offer. It's important to be aware of the provisions of the National Minimum Wage Regulations, which state that workers on 'stand-by time', 'on-call time' and 'downtime' must still be paid the National Minimum Wage if they are at their place of work and required to be there. Similarly, such time is likely to count as 'working time' under the Working Time Regulations if the worker is required to be on-call at the place of work. This means that it's against the law to ask employees to 'clock off' during quiet periods but still remain on the premises.

Zero-hours contracts may suit some people who want occasional earnings and are able to be entirely flexible about when they work. However, the unpredictable nature of working times means that they won't be for everyone.²

The perceived increase in zero-hours contracts has prompted expressions of concern both inside and outside of Parliament, although many support their use.

The following summarises recent data about the prevalence of zero-hours contracts, the legal issues that surround these contracts and the policy response to their use.

¹ "Close to the core: zero hours working surveyed", Flexible Working, January 1997

² The rise of the 'zero-hours' contract, Acas website (accessed 16 January 2013)

2. Zero-hours contracts statistics

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) collects statistics on zero-hour contracts as part of the Labour Force Survey and from a survey of businesses.³

All figures in this section are subject to sampling error and a degree of uncertainty as they are estimates from surveys.

2.1 Prevalence of zero-hour contracts

Number of people on zero-hour contracts

The Labour Force Survey (LFS) asks workers about the employment arrangements in their main job. The people who are identified by ONS as being on a zero-hours contract are those in employment who are aware that their contract allows for them to be offered no hours.

Estimates for October-December 2017 suggested that 901,000 people were on zero-hours contracts in their main job – representing 2.8% of all people in employment. This was a similar level to the same period a year before.⁴

The number of people who have reported that they are on a zero-hour contract has increased by around 200,000 since October-December 2014.

People in employment on zero-hour contracts

Labour force survey estimates

	In employment on zero-hour contract (thousands)	% of people in employment on zero-hour contract
2014 October-December	699	2.3
2015 October-December	804	2.5
2016 October-December	905	2.8
2017 October-December	901	2.8

Source: ONS, Labour Force Survey table EMP17

Number of zero-hour contracts

To estimate the number of zero hour contracts, the ONS asks a sample of businesses how many people are employed on contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours.

ONS estimates there were around 1.8 million zero-hours contracts in November 2017, based on its latest survey of UK businesses. This was equivalent to approximately 6% of all employment contracts at the time.⁵

³ The ONS briefing note Estimating zero hour contracts from the Labour Force Survey describes how the ONS estimates zero-hour contract figures. This also summarises technological adjustments made to the data in July 2013, which resulted in the statistics showing a higher number of people on zero-hour contracts.

⁴ ONS, UK Labour Market bulletin, February 2018, Table EMP17

The number of zero-hour contracts has stayed relatively stable since 2014, as have the proportion of contracts that are zero-hour. However there has been a fall in the number of businesses making some use of zero-hour contracts, suggesting that a smaller number of businesses are more heavily using zero-hour contracts.

Zero-hour contracts, ONS business survey estimates
	Number of zero-hour contracts (millions)	% of all contracts that are zero-hour	% of businesses making some use of zero-hour contracts
2014-Aug	1.8	6	11
2015-Nov	1.7	6	10
2016-Nov	1.7	6	7
2017-Nov	1.8	6	6

Source: ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: April 2018

Has there been a rise in the use of zero-hour contracts?

The figures suggest different trends in the use of zero-hour contracts. While the number of people on zero-hour contracts has increased by around 200,000 since 2014 (and by over 700,000 since 2011), the number of contracts themselves has remained at a similar level.

Detailed data from the LFS indicates that since 2011 much of the growth in zero-hour contract employment came from people on a zero-hour contract for extended periods of time (12 months and over). This suggests that people may have failed to report or acknowledge that they were in a zero-hours contract in earlier surveys. It is likely that some of this sharp rise was due to more awareness of zero-hours contracts as a result of media coverage rather than an actual change in people's circumstances.

However, it is not possible to calculate how much of the rise has been due to increased awareness, and how much has been due to a genuine increase in the number of people working on these contracts.

Why is the LFS estimate different from the business survey estimate?

The Labour Force Survey asks respondents whether their main job is on a zero-hour contract. The business survey asks businesses how many people are employed on contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours. The estimates from the two surveys will differ for a number of reasons:

- Some individuals responding to the Labour Force Survey may be unaware of their contractual arrangements or may not recognise

The ONS has reported that the upward trend for the number of people on zero-hour contracts "was likely to have been affected by greater awareness and recognition of the term "zero-hours contract".

⁵ ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: April 2018, 23 April 2018 the term 'zero-hours contract', in which case they will be excluded from the figures.

- Unlike the business survey, the LFS counts people rather than contracts and one person may have contracts with several different employers.
- The LFS only counts people who report that their main employment is on a zero-hours contract. They would not be included if their main employment was not on a zero-hours contract, even if they do an additional job which is. The additional job would be included in the business survey.
- There may be multiple contracts for each job in the business survey.⁶

2.2 Working hours for those on zero-hour contracts

People reporting that they were employed on a zero-hour contract worked, on average, for less hours than other workers. However the majority also reported that they did not want to work more hours. In October-December 2017:⁷

- 66% of people reporting that they were on a zero-hours contract were working part-time. In contrast 25% of people not on a zero-hour contract were working part-time.
- People reporting to be on a zero hour contract worked an average of 21.8 hours per week. This compares to 31.6 hours for all people in employment.⁸
- 16% of those people reporting to be on a zero hour contract worked no hours in the week before they were interviewed for the Labour Force Survey. This compares to 11% of other workers.
- Around 17% of people on a zero-hours contract reported that they wanted more hours in their current job. A further 5% wanted a replacement job with longer hours. This compares to around 6% who in employment not on a zero-hour contract who would like more hours in their current and around 1% who would like a replacement job with longer hours.
- Almost 60% of people on a zero-hour contract reported that they did not want more hours, compared to almost 75% of those in employment not on a zero-hour contract.

2.3 Characteristics of people employed on zero-hours contracts

People employed on zero-hour contracts were slightly more likely to be women, while over a third were under the age of 24. In October-December 2017:

⁶ ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: April 2018, 23 April 2018

⁷ All data in sections 2.2 and 2.3 are from ONS, UK Labour Market bulletin, February 2018, Table EMP17

⁸ Data is for actual weekly hours rather than usual weekly hours

- 55% of people on a zero-hours contract were women. These 493,000 women represented around 3% of all women in employment in that quarter. The 408,000 men on zero-hour contracts represented around 2% of all men in employment.
- 19% of people on a zero-hours contract were in full-time education. Around 2% of people on a contract with regular hours were in full-time education.
- People on a zero-hours contract were more likely to be at the youngest end of the age range. 36% of all people reporting to be on a zero-hours contract were aged 16-24.
- Likewise, zero-hours contracts made up a larger share of the young workforce: 8% of all 16-24 year-olds in employment were working on these contracts as opposed to around 2% of those aged 25 to 64.

People on a zero-hours contract as a share of their own age group

October to December 2017, Labour Force Survey, ONS

2.4 Prevalence by industry and business size

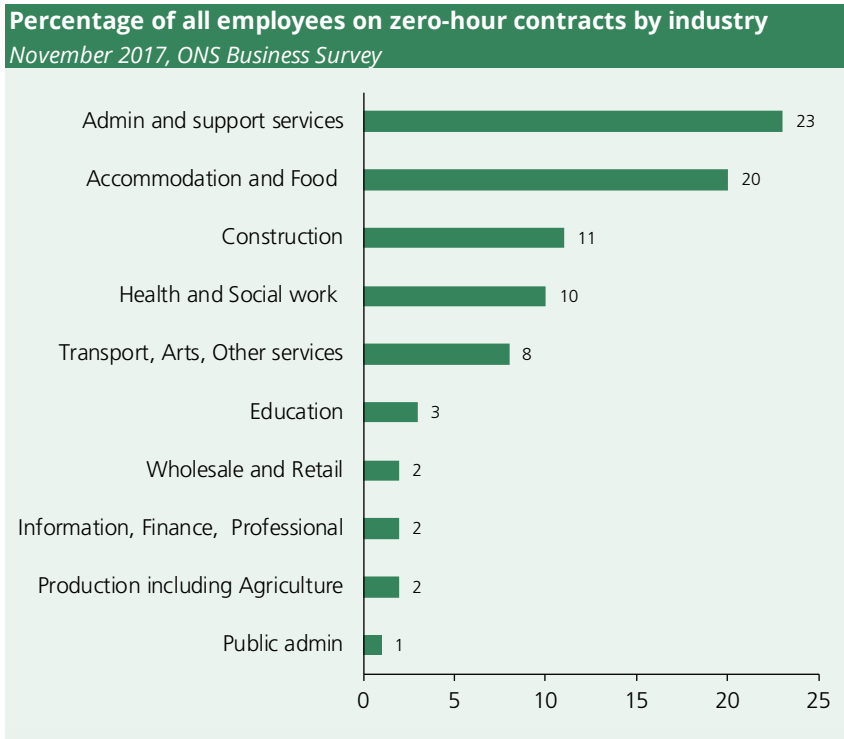

Around 6% of employers had at least some employees on zero-hours contracts, as estimated from the ONS business survey.⁹

As a share of industry workforce

The ONS business survey showed that the administration and support services industry and the accommodation and food industry had the highest concentration of zero-hour contract use. Over 40% of the employees on zero-hour contracts were in one of these industries in November 2017.¹⁰

⁹ Ibid.

¹⁰ ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: September 2017, Figure 4

Note: Education classification will include a large amount of local authorities. This is due to the possibility that the majority of employment in a local authority could belong to education; this would then classify the main activity of that local authority to education.

Business size

Zero-hours contracts were more common among larger employers, in November 2017 28% of employers with at least 250 employees made some use of zero-hours contracts compared with 5% of employers with fewer than 10 employees.¹¹

2.5 Pay

The Resolution Foundation (an economics think tank) published analysis of data from the ONS Labour Force Survey for 2011 to 2016. The Resolution Foundation looked at the difference in pay between workers on zero-hours contracts and those not on zero-hours contracts, after taking into account various worker characteristics.

They found that workers on a zero-hour contract incurred on average a 'precarious pay penalty' of 6.6 per cent (or 93p an hour) directly associated with zero hours work.¹²

A press release (30 December 2016) provides further detail:

While it is well known that ZHC workers earn less than permanent employees – 38 per cent less per hour on average – many people assume this is down to the fact the jobs are concentrated in low-paying sectors, and among younger and less experienced staff.

To get to the real pay penalty associated with ZHCs, the Foundation's analysis compares the pay of ZHC and non-ZHC

¹¹ ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: April 2018, 23 April 2018

¹² Resolution Foundation, Zero-hours contract workers face a 'precarious pay penalty' of £1,000 a year, 30 December 2016 workers with similar characteristics and doing similar jobs. It does this by controlling for a wide range of factors including the worker's gender, age, experience, qualification level, their occupation, the industry they work in and how long they've been in their current job. These factors explain around four-fifths of the overall pay gap between ZHC workers and other employees.

This analysis highlights a remaining 'precarious pay penalty' of 6.6 per cent (or 93p an hour) directly associated with zero hours work itself. For a typical ZHC worker, working 21 hours a week, this penalty amounts to £1,000 a year.

The findings do come with some important caveats. The Labour Force Survey is known to underestimate levels of pay compared to other sources and (as described above) is not the preferred source for data on the prevalence of zero-hour contracts.

2.6 Changes in how the ONS will collect data on zero-hour contracts

The ONS has announced that it is going to discontinue the survey of businesses in relation to zero-hour contracts. This will mean that, going forward, the ONS will not publish information on the number of zero-hour contracts, but will continue to publish how many people are employed on a zero-hour contract.¹³

One of the reasons that the ONS introduced the survey of businesses in Autumn 2013 was because the estimates of the prevalence of zero-hour contracts from the LFS were less than estimates produced by other industry-bodies.¹⁴

This was due, in part, to a low awareness of zero-hour contracts. As stated in section 2.1, since 2013 there has been increased publicity around zero-hour contracts, which has corresponded with a large increase in the number of people reporting that they are on such a contract.

The decision to discontinue the business survey suggests that the ONS are now satisfied that the information that they are deriving on zero hour contracts from the LFS is giving a reliable estimate of how many people are on such contracts.

¹³ ONS, Contracts that do not guarantee a minimum number of hours: April 2018, 23 April 2018

¹⁴ ONS, Analysis of Employee Contracts that do not Guarantee a Minimum Number of Hours, April 2014

3. The legal implications of zero-hours contracts

3.1 Zero-hours contracts and employment status

The use of zero-hours contracts raises a number of legal issues which affect both their utility to the employer as a contract for flexible labour and the worker in respect of their employment rights. Chief among these is the question of employment status; i.e. whether or not those working under such contracts are “employees”, “workers” or self-employed.¹⁵ The distinction between these concepts is complex although the principle point is that “worker” is a broad status affording core employment rights; “employee” is a narrower, overlapping status (all employees are also workers) affording additional rights, such as the right not to be unfairly dismissed; and a self-employed person is someone who is in business on their own account. The case law indicates that if the day-to-day reality of the work suggests a relationship of employment, the contract will be one of employment, and the person working under it will be classed as an employee.

A number of factors determine whether or not a contract is one of employment, although key elements of a contract of employment are:

- it must impose an obligation on a person to provide work personally;
- there must be mutuality of obligation between employer and employee;
- the worker must expressly or impliedly agree to be subject to the control of the person for whom he works to a ‘sufficient’ degree;
- the other provisions of the contract must be consistent with it being a contract of service.¹⁶

The case law on the use of zero-hours contracts has focused on the second issue: mutuality of obligation. Under contracts of employment the employee is normally obliged to work and the employer is obliged to provide work and pay for it. Such obligations are not readily apparent features of zero-hours contracts. However, mutuality may in certain cases be inferred. The circumstances in which it will be considered by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) in [Pulse Healthcare v Carewatch Care Services Ltd & Ors \[2012\]](#).¹⁷ The focus in that case was the reality of the agreement between the company and the worker, rather than an exclusive concern with the written terms of the contract.

¹⁵ For a basic overview of the distinction, see the GOV.UK page on employment status, here.

¹⁶ See: Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 Q.B. 497; Carmichael v National Power plc [2000] IRLR 43

¹⁷ UKEAT 0123_12_0608

The reality of the agreement

In Pulse Healthcare the EAT was required to decide whether the claimants were employees, within the meaning of section 230 of the Employment Rights Act 1996, despite being employed under a contract entitled “Zero-hours Contract Agreement”. The EAT concluded that the claimants were employees, and that there was a mutuality of obligation, notwithstanding the fact that the written terms of the contract suggested otherwise. As noted by the EAT, the proper approach to interpreting labour contracts is that set out by Mr Justice Elias in Consistent Group Ltd v Kalwak [2007] IRLR 560:

The concern to which tribunals must be alive is that armies of lawyers will simply place substitution clauses, or clauses denying any obligation to accept or provide work in employment contracts, as a matter of form, even where such terms do not begin to reflect the real relationship. Peter Gibson LJ was alive to the problem. He said this (p 697):

‘Of course, it is important that the industrial tribunal should be alert in this area of the law to look at the reality of any obligations. If the obligation is a sham, it will want to say so.’

In other words, if the reality of the situation is that no-one seriously expects that a worker will seek to provide a substitute, or refuse the work offered, the fact that the contract expressly provides for these unrealistic possibilities will not alter the true nature of the relationship.¹⁸

Thus, when deciding whether a zero-hours contract constitutes a contract of employment, conferring employee status, the wording of the contract will not be determinative of whether there is, in practice, a mutuality of obligation. The tribunal will look closely at the reality of the agreement. If the reality is that there is a pattern of regular work which is regularly accepted, the tribunal may deem the contract to be one of employment.¹⁹ This is illustrated by the decision at first instance (i.e. pre-appeal) of the Employment Tribunal in Pulse Healthcare:

Most of the factors point to the claimants in this case being employees under section 230(1). The only issue pursued on behalf of the second respondent is that of a lack of mutuality of obligation. I am satisfied there was sufficient mutuality of obligation for the claimants to be employees. Once the rota was prepared they were required to work and the employer was required to provide that work. They were subject to control and discipline; they had to provide personal services; they were provided with uniforms and equipment; they were paid on a PAYE basis; they had all worked regularly over a number of years and had only taken time off for holidays, sickness and when suspended for which they received payment; it was not established that there were gaps in the continuity of employment. The claimants required regular work and this was provided by the first respondent.

I am satisfied that the documents did not reflect the true agreement between the parties and that four essential contractual

¹⁸ Para 57-58; see also: Autoclenz v Belcher [2011] UKSC 41, para 25; Pulse Healthcare v Carewatch Care Services Ltd & Ors [2012], para 35

¹⁹ See also: St Ives Plymouth Ltd. v Haggerty [2008] All ER (D) 317; Wilson v Circular Distributors Ltd [2005] EATS/0043/05

13 Zero-hours contracts

terms were agreed: (1) that the claimants would perform the services for the first respondent (2) that the claimants would be paid for that work; (3) that the claimants were obliged to carry out the work offered to them and the first respondent undertook to offer work and (4) that the claimants must personally do the work and could not provide a substitute to do so. Those were the true terms of the contract.²⁰

The decision of the EAT indicates that where a worker is employed on a zero-hours contract and provided with regular work which is regularly accepted, there exists a possibility that the contract will be one of employment.

The EAT considered the employment status of zero-hours workers again in an unreported decision from 2014, in the case of Saha v Viewpoint Field Services Ltd UKEAT/01116/13. In Saha the EAT concluded that the claimant (a telephone interviewer) was not an employee due a lack of mutuality. Material to that decision was the fact the claimant lacked a set working pattern and was free to decline shifts. When looked at together, Pulse Healthcare and Shah show that the factual working pattern of a zero-hours worker will play a significant part in determining their employment status.

Continuity of service

Assuming that a zero-hours worker is able to establish employee status, they may yet face further difficulty. Many employment rights take effect only after a period of qualifying service. For example, the right not to be unfairly dismissed is only available to employees with two years' qualifying service. The sporadic nature of zero-hours work can lead to a break in the zero-hours employee's continuity of service (if, say, he is not provided with work for a week), preventing him or her from accumulating sufficient qualifying service to acquire these rights.

²⁰ Pulse Healthcare v Carewatch Care Services Ltd & Ors [2012], para 22

4. Zero-hours contracts and jobseeker benefits

Under Universal Credit, which replaces a number of previous benefits, including income-based JSA, refusal of zero-hours work could lead to a sanction and a loss of benefits. In 2014, in reply to a letter from Sheila Gilmore MP, Esther McVey, then Minister for Employment, stated sanctions could be imposed for failing to accept zero-hours work:

We believe that jobseekers on any benefit should do all they reasonable can to get into paid employment. This includes applying for suitable jobs and accepting any reasonable offer of employment. As part of this Jobcentre Plus coaches can require claimants to apply for particular vacancies that they consider to suitable. If someone fails to meet such a requirement – without good reason – then a sanction can be imposed.

We do not consider zero hours contracts to be – by default – unsuitable jobs. Indeed, the flexibility they offer can be valuable for some individuals. Within jobseekers Allowance, however, our coaches do not currently require claimants to apply for jobs with zero hours contracts. The structure of Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) and supporting processes could make the interaction of zero hour contracts and the benefit system difficult to manage – short periods of work could end a JSA claim, requiring new claims to be made in periods where earning fall.

Universal Credit, of course, is payable when people are in work as well as out of work so the need to reclaim when earning fluctuate is removed. In addition Universal Credit is designed to be response to variations in earnings so each monthly payment will reflect the amount actually earned, even if this includes some weeks when no work was done. So in Universal Credit our coaches can mandate zero hours contracts.²¹

According to the Guardian, a spokesperson for the Department for Work and Pensions told the newspaper “jobseekers would not be required to take a zero-hours contract that tied them in exclusively to work for a single employer”.²² It appears that the Department for Work and Pensions does not know how many people on Universal Credit work under zero-hours contracts:

Universal Credit: Zero Hours Contracts: Written question - 21673

Q

Asked by Frank Field

Asked on: 08 January 2016

Department for Work and Pensions Universal Credit: Zero Hours Contracts

To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, what information his Department holds on the number of universal credit claimants who are employed on a zero-hours contract.

²¹ Letter from Esther McVey MP to Sheila Gilmore MP, dated 1 March 2014.

²² ‘Jobseekers being forced into zero-hours roles’, the Guardian, 5 May 2014

15 Zero-hours contracts

A

Answered by: Priti Patel

Answered on: 13 January 2016

Universal Credit is paid on the basis of earnings. Information on types of contracts that claimants are on is not routinely collected.

5. Coalition Government review of zero-hours contracts

On 30 May 2013 the Chartered Institute of Personnel Development reported that the then Business Secretary, Vince Cable, had said the Coalition Government was reviewing the use of zero-hours contracts.²³

On 1 July 2013 Jo Swinson, then Minister for Employment Relations, responded to questions from Chuka Umunna, then Shadow Business Secretary, about the review:

Mr Umunna: To ask the Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills by what date he expects his Department's investigation of zero-hours contracts to be complete; and if he will publish any subsequent report.

Jo Swinson: Officials are currently speaking informally to a variety of stakeholders, including trade unions and industry bodies representing sectors where zero-hours contracts to gather information. They will report their findings to me after summer recess.

We will consider next steps when we better understand the issues for both businesses and people engaged on these contracts.

Mr Umunna: To ask the Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills whether he will issue a call for evidence and initiate a consultation process as part of his Department's investigation into zero-hours contracts; and by what other means organisations and interested parties can submit evidence as part of his Department's investigation.

Jo Swinson: There are no plans to issue a call for evidence or consultation at this stage. Officials within the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS) are currently researching how zero-hours contracts are being used by businesses.

They are currently speaking informally to a variety of stakeholders, including industry bodies representing sectors where they are in use and also trade unions to gather information. If organisations have information they feel is relevant to the work that is currently under way, they should contact the Labour Market Directorate in BIS.²⁴

On 9 July 2013 Ms Swinson said:

We will work with other Departments. There is no call for evidence at this stage, but we do not rule it out for the future. Research shows that doing our homework before issuing a call for evidence is useful. I welcome the interest the debate has sparked, and I am sure that we will return to the topic when we have the further information from the BIS fact-finding review.²⁵

In an interview with the Guardian Vince Cable said that the Government may seek to legislate on zero-hours contracts, although he ruled out a ban. He highlighted as a specific problem situations

²³ Government 'reviewing zero hours contracts,' says Business Secretary, CIPD website, 30 May 2013 (accessed 3 June 2013)

²⁴ HC Deb 1 July 2013 c512W-513W

²⁵ HC Deb 9 July 2013 c56WH

17 Zero-hours contracts

... where there is an exclusive relationship with a particular employer who actually cannot provide stable employment, or indeed any employment, that stops the worker going to another company.²⁶

An August 2013 paper by a research organisation, The Work Foundation, stated that the review was welcome although it argued for “a more systematic approach – perhaps along the lines of the Coalition’s Fair Pay Review”.²⁷

A Department for Business, Innovation and Skills press statement issued on 16 September 2013 described the outcome of the review:

The review conducted over the summer highlighted 4 key areas of concern:

Exclusivity: This is where someone agrees to a contract that does not guarantee them a minimum number of hours and is stopped from working for another company. This is described as an ‘exclusivity clause’. In certain cases this can mean that people were stopped from looking for work elsewhere particularly when they needed more hours to bump up their earnings. Feedback from employers themselves suggests awareness that there can be abuses that limit flexibility.

Transparency: There is no clear or legal definition of a ZHC and it can cover a number of working arrangements. This can lead to confusion and a lack of understanding on contract details and what it means for the individual. In some cases people were not aware of the fact that there was a possibility that they might not be offered work on a regular basis.

Uncertainty of earnings: The amount of money a person on a ZHC can expect to earn is dependent on the number of hours worked. This means that people on a ZHC find it hard to calculate earnings and it can lead to concerns about how benefits might be affected.

Balance of power in the employment relationship: Our review found that people perceived they would be penalised if they did not take hours offered even if the hours were offered at very short notice and did not suit. This meant it could lead to a climate of fear that a person is less likely to be offered regular work in future if they failed to accept the hours on offer.²⁸

²⁶ Zero-hours contracts could be subject to new legislation, says Vince Cable, The Guardian [online], 5 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

²⁷ Ian Brinkley, Flexibility or insecurity? Exploring the rise in zero hours contracts, August 2013, p.27; see also Government zero hours review 'inadequate', The Telegraph [online], 28 August 2013

²⁸ Cable announces plans to boost fairness for workers, BIS press statement, 16 September 2013 (accessed 18 September 2013)

6. Coalition Government consultations

On 16 September 2013 Vince Cable announced that he would launch a consultation on zero-hours contracts. He said:

I have been examining closely the issue of zero-hour contracts over the last few months. We've been speaking to businesses, trade unions and other groups both about their downsides and their benefits.

It is clear that they are much more widely used than we had previously thought. It is also clear that there are abuses in the system, especially around the issue of exclusivity which some employers are demanding from workers on these contracts.

Today I am announcing that we will proceed to issue a consultation, which will explore how to tackle any abuses, particularly around exclusivity. I am determined to make sure people are paid and treated fairly, in a way that also helps keep people employed in these delicate economic times.²⁹

The consultation was launched on 19 December 2013 and ran until 13 March 2014. The consultation document identified exclusivity clauses as being particularly concerning and sought views on whether it was appropriate to ban these in contracts that provide no guarantee of work.³⁰

6.1 Consultation outcome: banning exclusivity clauses

On 25 June 2014 the Coalition Government published a press release detailing the outcome of the consultation, and announcing the Government's intention to ban the use of exclusivity clauses:

Employees on zero hours contracts will have the freedom to find work with more than 1 employer after Business Secretary Vince Cable announced plans to ban exclusivity clauses.

Exclusivity clauses prevent an individual from working for another employer, even when no work is guaranteed. The use of exclusivity clauses in zero hours contracts undermines choice and flexibility for the individuals concerned.

The ban, set to benefit the 125,000 zero hours contract workers estimated to be tied to an exclusivity clause, is part of a bid to clamp down on abuses in the workplace by less scrupulous employers. It will allow workers to look for additional work to boost their income.

Business Secretary Vince Cable said:

Zero hours contracts have a place in today's labour market. They offer valuable flexible working opportunities for students, older people and other people looking to top up their income and find work that suits their personal circumstances.

²⁹ Ibid

³⁰ BIS, Consultation: Zero hours employment contracts, December 2013

But it has become clear that some unscrupulous employers abuse the flexibility that these contracts offer to the detriment of their workers. Today (25 June 2014), we are legislating to clamp down on abuses to ensure people get a fair deal.

Last December (2013), I launched a consultation into this issue. Following overwhelming evidence we are now banning the use of exclusivity in zero hours contracts and committing to increase the availability of information for employees on these contracts. We will also work with unions and business to develop a best practice code of conduct aimed at employers who wish to use zero hours contracts as part of their workforce.

This action follows a government consultation into zero hours contracts which received over 36,000 responses. 83% were in favour of banning exclusivity clauses in zero hours contracts.

The Business Secretary also announced that the government will:

- consult further on how to prevent rogue employers evading the exclusivity ban, for example through offering 1 hour fixed contracts
- work with business representatives and unions to develop a code of practice on the fair use of zero hours contracts by the end of the year (2014)
- work with stakeholders to review existing guidance and improve information available to employees and employers on using these contracts.³¹

6.2 Consultation on banning exclusivity clauses

The Coalition Government proposed measures in the Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Bill – now an Act (see below) - that would render exclusivity clauses unenforceable.

³¹ Government crackdown on zero hours contract abusers, GOV.UK, 25 June 2014 (accessed 29 June 2014)

7. Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015

The Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015 came into force on 26 March 2015. Section 153 came into force on 26 May 2015 and seeks to render unenforceable exclusivity clauses in zero-hours contracts. The section amended the Employment Rights Act 1996, inserting a new Part 2A.

Section 27(1) defines “zero hours contract” as a contract of employment or other worker’s contract under which—

- (a) the undertaking to do or perform work or services is an undertaking to do so conditionally on the employer making work or services available to the worker, and
- (b) there is no certainty that any such work or services will be made available to the worker.

Commentators criticised this definition, pointing out that it might easily be sidestepped by providing a nominal amount of work (e.g. one hour per month).

Section 27A(2) of the 1996 Act as amended contains the ban on exclusivity clauses:

(3) Any provision of a zero hours contract which—

- (a) prohibits the worker from doing work or performing services under another contract or under any other arrangement, or
- (b) prohibits the worker from doing so without the employer’s consent, is unenforceable against the worker.

Commentators highlighted that the contractual unenforceability of the clause would be meaningless vis-à-vis the worker if the employer was nonetheless free to refrain from providing future work should the worker ignore an exclusivity requirement.

Partly to address the above criticism, the Act created a power to make delegated legislation supporting the prohibition of exclusivity clauses, which the Coalition Government consulted on, but which were not brought into force at the same time as the 2015 Act, as some had expected.

7.1 Exclusivity Terms Regulations

The Act created a power enabling a Minister to make regulations that would penalise employers who use exclusivity clauses. The Coalition Government consulted on how best to go about using this power; the consultation ran between 25 August 2014 and 3 November 2014, and included a set of draft regulations.³² Draft regulations were laid before the House of Commons on 19 October 2015, subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, and came into force on 14 December 2015 as the Exclusivity Terms in Zero Hours Contracts \(Redress\) Regulations 2015 \(SI 2015/2021\).

21 Zero-hours contracts

The regulations create rights for:

- zero-hours workers classed as “employees” not to be unfairly dismissed for failing to comply with an exclusivity requirement;
- zero-hours workers classed as “workers” not to be subjected to any detriment for failing to comply with an exclusivity requirement.

The rights are enforceable against an employer by way of a claim to an employment tribunal. Where a tribunal considers a claim to be well-founded, it may make a declaration to that effect and award compensation, subject to the same limit as that applicable in unfair dismissal claims.³³

³² Zero hours employment contracts: exclusivity clause ban avoidance, GOV.UK (accessed 18 November 2014)

³³ This is a combination of the ‘basic award’ calculated by reference to age and period of service, currently capped at £14,370, and the ‘compensatory award’, designed to reflect the claimant’s loss, subject to a cap of £78,962 or a year’s pay whichever is less. In practice, it is unlikely that compensation ordered would come anywhere near these limits.

8. Labour Party proposals

Labour's 2017 general election manifesto committed to:

Ban zero hours contracts – so that every worker gets a guaranteed number of hours each week.³⁴

During the 2016 Labour Party conference the leader of the Labour Party, Jeremy Corbyn, said

Without proper employment regulation, there's been an explosion of temporary, insecure jobs nearly one million people on zero hour contracts.

...

we'll ban zero hours contracts³⁵

Mr Corbyn also advocated banning zero-hours contracts during a speech earlier in the year, on the 'Labour case to vote remain in the EU':

... if we want to stop insecurity at work and the exploitation of zero hours contracts that are being used to drive down pay and conditions, why don't we do what other European countries have done and simply ban them?

Zero hours contracts are not allowed in Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, Poland and Spain. It seems we're the odd one out. Our politicians now in power are choosing not to tackle exploitation, but we will.³⁶

This Full Fact report has further information on the treatment of zero-hours contracts in other European countries.³⁷

8.1 Labour Party proposals prior to the 2015 General Election

In a speech to the Trades Union Congress on 10 September 2013 the then Leader of the Opposition, Ed Miliband, stated that a Labour government would make a number of changes to the regulation of zero-hours contracts:

We'll ban zero hours contracts which require workers to work exclusively for one business. We'll stop zero hours contracts which require workers to be on call all day without any guarantee of work. And we'll end zero hours contracts where workers are working regular hours but are denied a regular contract.³⁸

On 16 October 2013 there was an Opposition Day debate on a motion calling on the Government to initiate a full consultation and formal call for evidence on the use of zero-hour contracts.³⁹ Alongside these

³⁴ The Labour Party Manifesto 2017, p47

³⁵ Jeremy Corbyn, Leader of the Labour Party, speech at Annual Conference in Liverpool 2016, Labour Press, 28 September 2016

³⁶ Jeremy Corbyn speech on the Labour case to vote remain in the EU in South Yorkshire, Labour Party website, 16 June 2016

³⁷ Zero hours contracts: is the UK "the odd one out"?, Full Fact website, 26 July 2016

³⁸ Speech by Ed Miliband to the TUC, 10 September 2013, TUC website (accessed 14 October 2013)

³⁹ HC Deb 16 October 2013 cc744-797

statements, Mr Miliband asked Norman Pickavance, the former director of human resources at supermarket chain Morrisons, to investigate the possible regulation of zero-hours contracts,⁴⁰ and a consultation into the issue was launched.⁴¹

The Pickavance Report

On 25 April 2014, Labour published the Pickavance Report: Zeroed Out: The place of zero-hours contracts in a fair and productive economy.⁴²

The report made a number of policy recommendations intended to “prevent certain exploitative practices used by a minority”.⁴³ The recommendations were:

- Employers should be prevented from requiring zero-hours workers to be available for work:
 - clauses that require workers on zero-hours contracts to be available for work should be declared by legislation to be unenforceable.... The employer would not be able to demand (either contractually or verbally) that they make themselves available without any guarantee of work.⁴⁴
- A ban of exclusivity clauses:
 - Workers on zero-hours contracts should be free to work for other employers.... Clauses that require workers on zero-hours contracts to be available for work and prohibit the worker from working for another employer at the time should be declared by legislation to be unenforceable when there is no guarantee of work or pay.⁴⁵
- Zero-hours workers who in practice work regular hours should, after a specified period, have a right to a contract with fixed minimum hours:
 - after 6 months, workers should have a right to request a contract that is other than zero-hours and which provides a minimum amount of work. Employers would only be able to refuse this request if they are able to demonstrate that their business needs cannot be met by any other form of flexible contract.... after a period of 12 months continuous employment, workers on zero-hours contracts who are working regular hours (e.g. a minimum of 8 hours a week over the reference period) should have the right to be offered a contract that is other than zero-hours and which provides a minimum amount of work. It is proposed that this would happen automatically and should reflect the actual hours that people are working on a regular basis. People working regular hours would only be able to be legally kept on a zero hour contract for more than a year if they formally opted-out of these arrangements. To do so the employer must demonstrate that the employee has

⁴⁰ Ed Miliband to pledge crackdown on zero-hour contracts, BBC News website, 9 September 2013 (14 October 2013)

⁴¹ The Pickavance consultation on the abuse of zero-hours contracts, 2013

⁴² Labour Party, Zeroed Out: The place of zero-hours contracts in a fair and productive economy: an independent report by Norman Pickavance, 25 April 2014

⁴³ Ibid, p16

⁴⁴ Ibid

⁴⁵ Ibid

received independent advice from a trade union or independent legal adviser....⁴⁶

- Zero-hours workers should have a right to compensation when shifts are cancelled at short notice.

In addition to the above, the report recommended that a zero-hours code of practice should be drawn up – developed by employer and employee representatives and Acas - to provide guidance to employers and employees.⁴⁷

Labour Party Manifesto 2015

The Labour Party's manifesto for the 2015 General Election included a commitment to "Ban exploitative zero hour contracts so that if you work regular hours you get a regular contract."⁴⁸

8.2 Private Members' Bill

On 2 July 2014 the Zero Hours Contracts Bill - a Private Members' Bill sponsored by Ian Mearns MP - was presented to Parliament through the ballot procedure.⁴⁹ The Bill's Second Reading commenced on 21 November 2014; the debate was adjourned and the Bill failed to progress further.

⁴⁶ Ibid, p17

⁴⁷ Page 18

⁴⁸ Labour, Changing Britain Together, 2015, p15

⁴⁹ Result of the Private Members' Bill ballot: Session 2014-15

9. Taylor Review

On 1 October 2016 the Prime Minister commissioned Matthew Taylor, Chief Executive of the Royal Society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce (RSA), to assess the implications for employment regulation of new forms of work, driven by digital platforms. The Independent Review of Employment Practices in the Modern Economy launched on 30 November 2016.⁵⁰ The report, entitled Good Work: The Taylor Review of Modern Working Practices, was published on 11 July 2017. The report is discussed in the Library's briefing on employment status.⁵¹

The Taylor Review was broadly positive about the flexibility afforded by zero-hours contracts:

Flexibility has been a key part of enabling business to respond to changing market conditions and has supported record employment rates. Individuals have the opportunity to work in a range of different ways, on hours that fit around other responsibilities, such as studies or caring responsibilities. The Labour Force Survey published in March 2017 found that almost one fifth of people on zero hours contracts are in full-time education, and 68% of those on zero hours contracts do not want more hours.⁵²

However, it was critical about what it saw as 'one-way flexibility':

we have heard repeatedly during the Review that there is an issue of flexibility not being reciprocated, with a requirement to be available for work at very short notice, without any guarantee that work will actually be available. This makes it very difficult for a person to manage their financial obligations, or for example secure a mortgage. This can feel unfair, especially when the reality of the working arrangement is that the individual regularly works 40 hours a week. While in theory individuals in these working arrangements have the right to turn down work, we were told that workers, needing work but lacking unfair dismissal rights, often felt that to express legitimate views about conditions or make even reasonable requests risked having future work denied to them.⁵³

The Review suggested that the benefits of flexibility could be shared more equally if the Government ensured that workers were entitled to a higher minimum rate of pay for hours that are not guaranteed. To this end, it recommended:

Government must take steps to ensure that flexibility does not benefit the employer, at the unreasonable expense of the worker, and that flexibility is genuinely a mutually beneficial arrangement. With this in mind, we believe that Government should ask the Low Pay Commission (LPC), in its next remit, to advise on the

⁵⁰ Taylor review on modern employment practices launches, Gov.uk, 30 November 2016

⁵¹ Employment status, Commons Briefing papers CBP-8045

⁵² Good Work: The Taylor Review of Modern Working Practices, July 2017, p43

⁵³ Ibid.

impact of bringing in a higher National Minimum Wage for hours which are not guaranteed in a contract.⁵⁴

The Review also recommended that zero-hours workers be given the right to request regular hours:

we believe an explicit right for this group should be introduced. The average weekly hours worked over the previous 12 months should be the starting assumption for any new contract.

Government should act to create a right to request a contract that guarantees hours which better reflect the actual hours worked, for those on zero hour contracts who have been in post for 12 months.⁵⁵

9.1 Government response

The Government responded to the Taylor Review on 7 February 2018.⁵⁶ It accepted the recommendation regarding the National Minimum Wage:

We accept the review's recommendation to ask the LPC to explore the impacts of introducing a higher NMW rate for hours that are not guaranteed as part of the contract. We will also investigate alternative means of tackling the issue, and ask the LPC to do the same and provide advice on the impacts of alternative options. The LPC will provide their assessment of the impact of these options to Ministers in their October 2018 report.⁵⁷

It also accepted the recommendation on the right to request more regular hours. The Government is currently consulting on the issue, and has proposed extending this right to all workers, rather than solely agency and zero-hours contracts workers.⁵⁸

⁵⁴ Ibid., p44

⁵⁵ Ibid., p48

⁵⁶ HM Government, Good Work A response to the Taylor Review of Modern Working Practices, February 2018, p39

⁵⁷ Ibid., p39

⁵⁸ BEIS, GOOD WORK: THE TAYLOR REVIEW OF MODERN WORKING PRACTICES: Consultation on measures to increase transparency in the UK labour market, February 2018, pp27-28

10. Scottish Affairs Committee report

On 9 April 2014 the House of Commons Scottish Affairs Committee published a report on the use of zero-hours contracts in Scotland: Zero hours contracts in Scotland: Interim Report.⁵⁹ The Committee's recommendations are summarised on the Parliament website:

- zero hours contracts must only be used where the employer can objectively justify it;
- the Government must do more to protect workers who wish to challenge unfair, unsafe or unlawful conditions of employment;
- workers should be told from the outset of their employment what type of contract they are on and a written contract setting out the terms and conditions must follow within two months;
- there should be a minimum notice period of work and workers should not be punished for turning down offers of work made within that period;
- where workers arrive for work but find none available then the employer should compensate them for the inconvenience;
- travel time between appointments should be paid and pay for zero hours workers should accurately reflect the number of hours that are worked to fulfil contracted duties;
- an employer-led Code of Practice is unlikely to help workers who are exploited – in fact it may serve to embed a form of employment that in most circumstances is hard to justify;
- if a Code is produced it should only be as a stepping stone to, or following, legislative change aimed at reducing the use of zero hours contracts and ensuring workers receive the income, rights and protections to which they are entitled.⁶⁰

⁵⁹ House of Commons Scottish Affairs Committee, Zero hours contracts in Scotland: Interim Report, Tenth Report of Session 2013–14, HC 654, 9 April 2014

⁶⁰ Commons Select Committee - Unscrupulous employers exploiting workers through zero-hours contracts, Parliament website (accessed 1 May 2014)

11. Comment

Opinion on zero-hours contracts has been mixed. Employee organisations tend to argue that the contracts result in financial insecurity for workers who lack key employment rights,⁶¹ although acknowledge that some staff value the flexibility and opportunity to work a second job;⁶² employer organisations stress their utility when seeking to meet fluctuating demand and argue that they play a vital role in keeping people in employment.⁶³ The Trades Union Congress has said:

The TUC believes that the rise of involuntary and casual temporary work, along with increases in involuntary part-time work and zero-hours contracts, show that beneath the headline employment figures lies an increasingly insecure, vulnerable workforce. Too many workers are not working enough hours to get by, or have no guarantee of paid work from one week to the next, says the TUC.⁶⁴

The trade union Unite has said:

Unite believes that in general zero-hours contracts are unfair, creating insecurity and exploitation for many ordinary people struggling to get by. They are one of many forms of underemployment blighting the British economy. Employers use them to cut wages, avoid holiday pay, pensions, or other benefits enjoyed by employees and agency staff.⁶⁵

The usage of zero-hours contracts by Sports Direct at its Shirebrook warehouse was one of the aspects of work there criticised in a recent report by the Business, Innovation and Skills Committee report, Employment practices at Sports Direct.⁶⁶ The report illustrates some of the difficulties that may be faced by zero-hours workers:

Sports Direct employs staff on zero-hour contracts for their retail shops. When Keith Hellowell, Chairman of Sports Direct, gave evidence to the Scottish Affairs Committee in March 2015, he justified the use of zero-hour contracts by saying that "it gives us the flexibility of the work force. We have available the staff we need at the times we need them and for the number of hours that we need them".

We received damning testimonies from Sports Direct workers, past and present, about the misuse of the contracts and inadequate working conditions, including the following:

⁶¹ Government must act to halt rise in zero hours, Unite website, 1 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013); UNISON fact sheet on zero hours contracts, UNISON website (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁶² UNISON fact sheet on zero hours contracts, UNISON website (accessed 3 September 2013), p.2

⁶³ Zero-hours work kept down dole queues, says CBI, Financial Times [online], 7 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013); JobsOutlook: More employers happy with the state of the economy, Recruitment and Employment Confederation Press Notice, 21 August 2013; Banning zero hours contracts would be "misguided and extremely damaging" - says IoD, Institute of Directors Press Release, 5 August 2013

⁶⁴ Involuntary temporary jobs driving rising employment, TUC website, 9 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁶⁵ Government must act to halt rise in zero hours, Unite website, 1 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁶⁶ Third Report of Session 2016–17, HC 219, 19 July 2016

“... Staff on zero-hour contracts were being forced to work a further three hours without pay (and if they refused, they would not be offered any hours the following day)”⁶⁷

John Cridland, former Director-General of the Confederation of British Industry has said “If we hadn’t had this flexible working when the economy contracted, unemployment would have topped 3m – and it didn’t it went to 2.5m”.⁶⁸ Mike Cherry, National Chairman of the Federation of Small Businesses, argued that the “use of these contracts is a question of responsible management. There are situations where zero hour contracts are a good fit for employee and employer”.⁶⁹ Alexander Ehmann, former Head of Regulatory Policy at the Institute of Directors said:

Taking on a full-time member of staff remains a risky and potentially expensive option for any company emerging from the downturn.

Zero Hours Contracts can be a vital tool in our economic recovery, giving flexibility to both employer and worker whilst also guaranteeing basic employment rights.⁷⁰

In an article in The Telegraph Simon Walker, Director General of the Institute of Directors, said that part of the reason for the increase in zero-hours contracts is that current employment law is restrictive and taking on a full-time employee is risky.⁷¹

A June 2013 report by the Resolution Foundation stated that zero-hours contracts lead to financial uncertainty for workers and their dependants.⁷² However, that report also noted that it might be too soon to implement a ban.⁷³ This was reiterated in an August 2013 report by The Work Foundation which said that “calls to ban zero hour contracts ... are in our view misplaced”.⁷⁴

Research published in August 2013 by the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development found that, across all zero-hours workers surveyed, 14% reported that their employer “...often or very often fails to provide them with sufficient hours to have a basic standard of living. However 18% say this does not happen very often and 52% say this does not happen at all often.”⁷⁵ Peter Cheese, CEO of the CIPD said

⁶⁷

⁶⁸ Zero-hours work kept down dole queues, says CBI, Financial Times [online], 7 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁶⁹ Less than one in 10 FSB members use zero hours contract, Investor Interactive, 21 August 2013 (accessed 4 September 2013)

⁷⁰ Banning zero hours contracts would be "misguided and extremely damaging" - says IoD, Institute of Directors Press Release, 5 August 2013 (accessed 4 September 2013)

⁷¹ Zero hours are bad? Don't talk such nonsense, The Telegraph [online], 10 August 2013

⁷² Alakeson, V., Cory, G, Pennycook, M., A Matter of Time: The rise of zero-hours contracts, June 2013

⁷³ Ibid, p.4

⁷⁴ Ian Brinkley, Flexibility or insecurity? Exploring the rise in zero hours contracts, August 2013

⁷⁵ Zero hours contracts more widespread than thought - but only minority of zero hours workers want to work more hours, CIPD website, 5 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

that its figures suggest the assumption that zero-hours contracts are bad should be questioned.⁷⁶

A report published by the CIPD in November 2013, based on a survey of over 1,000 employers and over 2,500 employees, derived from a sample of individuals that had agreed to take part in YouGov surveys, of which 479 were on zero-hours contracts,⁷⁷ made a number of findings, including:

- Zero-hours workers, when compared to the average UK employee, are just as satisfied with their job (60% versus 59%), happier with their work-life balance (65% vs 58%), and less likely to think they are treated unfairly by their organisation (27% vs 29%).
- Zero-hours workers are, on average, nearly twice as likely to be satisfied with having no minimum set contracted hours, as they are to be dissatisfied. Almost half (47%) say they are satisfied compared with around a quarter (27%) who report being dissatisfied. The most common explanation for this is that flexible working suits their current circumstances (44% of those saying they are satisfied or very satisfied with having no minimum set contracted hours).
- More than half (52%) of zero-hours workers say they would not like to work more hours than they do in a typical week, although just over a third (38%) say they would like more hours.
- Eight out of ten (80%) zero-hours staff say they are never penalised for not being available for work.
- Employers cite both sides of the flexibility equation in explaining their use of these contracts: two thirds (66%) highlight their need for the flexibility to respond to peaks and troughs in demand, but around a half (47%) of employers who use zero-hours contracts also cite the need to provide flexibility for individuals as one of the reasons informing their approach.
- One in five zero-hours workers say they are sometimes (17%) or always (3%) penalised if they are not available for work.
- Almost half of zero-hours workers say they receive no notice at all (40%) or find out at the beginning of an expected shift (6%) that work has been cancelled, and only about a third of employers tell us they make a contractual provision or have a formal policy outlining their approach to arranging (32%) and cancelling work (34%) for zero-hours workers.
- One in five (21%) zero-hours workers believe their pay is lower than comparable permanent staff doing similar jobs,

⁷⁶ Ibid

⁷⁷ CIPD, Zero-hours contracts - Myth and reality, November 2013, pp43-44

while one in ten employers (11%) report that this is the case. In fact, almost two-thirds (64%) of employers who use zero-hours workers report that hourly rates for these staff are about the same as an employee doing the same role on a permanent contract. Nearly a fifth (18%) report that hourly rates for zero-hours staff are higher than permanent employees (with the proportion slightly higher in the private sector).

- Confusion among some employers and zero-hours staff over employment status and rights. For example, 42% of zero-hours staff don't know if they have the right to take legal action if unfairly dismissed after two years service.⁷⁸

In a blog post on the Institute of Economic Affairs' website, Professor Len Shackleton said that zero-hours contracts have a place in the labour market, offering opportunities to those who would otherwise "find it difficult to take regular work at fixed times: think of students and single parents".⁷⁹

Brian Groom, former UK business and employment editor at the Financial Times, wrote that regulation of the contracts would be fraught with danger, and that a blanket ban "could hit jobs by making many activities uneconomic".⁸⁰ An editorial in the Financial Times argued that the UK should not ban the contracts but regulate their use, particularly where exclusivity is demanded (i.e. the worker is unable to work for another employer), in which case workers should be guaranteed base pay or minimum hours, and statutory employment rights.⁸¹

An editorial in The Telegraph said that the contracts "make eminent sense in areas where work is seasonal or intermittent, such as retail and hospitality, or where money is tight",⁸² whereas one in The Guardian suggested "the best way to see zero-hours contracts is as the most striking symptom of a sick economy and a malfunctioning labour market – one geared up to providing low-paid, precarious work."⁸³

⁷⁸ 'Zero-hours contracts have been unfairly demonised and oversimplified', finds new CIPD research, CIPD website, 26 November 2013 (accessed 29 November 2013)

⁷⁹ Zero-hours contracts have their place in the labour market, Len Shackleton, IEA blog, 6 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁸⁰ Zero hours: act with caution, Brian Groom, FT website, 5 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁸¹ Zero-hours workers, FT website, 1 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁸² A misguided crusade against flexible labour, The Telegraph [online], 5 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

⁸³ Zero-hours contracts: nil points, The Guardian [online], 9 August 2013 (accessed 3 September 2013)

About the Library

The House of Commons Library research service provides MPs and their staff with the impartial briefing and evidence base they need to do their work in scrutinising Government, proposing legislation, and supporting constituents.

As well as providing MPs with a confidential service we publish open briefing papers, which are available on the Parliament website.

Every effort is made to ensure that the information contained in these publically available research briefings is correct at the time of publication. Readers should be aware however that briefings are not necessarily updated or otherwise amended to reflect subsequent changes.

If you have any comments on our briefings please email papers@parliament.uk. Authors are available to discuss the content of this briefing only with Members and their staff.

If you have any general questions about the work of the House of Commons you can email hcinfo@parliament.uk.

Disclaimer

This information is provided to Members of Parliament in support of their parliamentary duties. It is a general briefing only and should not be relied on as a substitute for specific advice. The House of Commons or the author(s) shall not be liable for any errors or omissions, or for any loss or damage of any kind arising from its use, and may remove, vary or amend any information at any time without prior notice.

The House of Commons accepts no responsibility for any references or links to, or the content of, information maintained by third parties. This information is provided subject to the conditions of the Open Parliament Licence.