Social and General Statistics

This Note provides data on the number of electors and attainers in each parliamentary constituency as at 1 December 2009, published by the Office for National Statistics on 26 February 2010.¹

There are 646 constituencies in the UK at the moment. At the next General Election, there will be new boundaries for constituencies in England and Wales. There will be 650 constituencies as a result of the number in England being increased by four. On average, the number of electors in constituencies in England will, however, remain higher than in any of the other three home countries, although the gap will be smaller than previously. Constituencies in Scotland will on average have around 6,000 fewer electors than in England.

1 Constituency level data

The number of parliamentary electors in the UK rose by 226,359 (0.5%) from December 2008 to 45,420,808 in December 2009. Following the passage of the Electoral Administration Act in Summer 2006 electoral registration officers (ERO's) were required to take certain specified steps in conducting the electoral registration canvassing as part of complying with this amended duty. This resulted in an increase in the numbers for England and Wales. In Great Britain, electors remain on the register unless they information their electoral registration office of a change of circumstances, whereas in Northern Ireland they must re-register each year. Outreach projects in schools and colleges in Northern Ireland have helped increase the number of young people on the registers and in the number of attainers².

Within the UK there is a considerable range in the size of the electorate of individual constituencies; from the largest, the Isle of Wight, with 110,228 electors to the smallest, Na h-Eileanan an Iar (Western Isles) with 21,908 registered voters. On average, constituencies in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are smaller than in England. Following the reduction in the number of Westminster constituencies for Scotland, the average for Welsh constituencies is the lowest of the four UK countries. The number of constituencies in use at the next election will increase from 646 to 650.
